BUS'TLE, (bus'l,) v. i. [This word may be allied to busy, or to L. festino.]

To stir quick, to be very active, to be very quick in motion, often or usually with the sense of noise or agitation.

> And leave the world for me to bustle in Shak.

BUS'Y, (biz'zy,) a. [Sax. bysi, bisig, whence bisgian, to busy, to use. This word appears, from the Dutch, to be composed of be, the prefix, and zig, the root of see, contracted in Int. to zien, but retained in the pret. zag, and in the derivatives, zigt, sight, zighaar, visible. We find besigtigen signifies to view. If this opinion is correct, the primary sense is seeing, or closely inspecting.]

1. Employed with constant attention; engaged about something that renders interruption inconvenient; as, a man is busy in posting his books.

> My mistress is busy, and can not come. Shak.

2. Actively employed; occupied without cessation; constantly in motion; as, a busy bee. Shak.

3. Active in that which does not concern the person; meddling with or prying into the affairs of others; officious; importunate: hence, troublesome; vexatious. Waller.

BUT, part. fot butan, a. [Sax. butan, beton, buta, bute, without, on the outside, abroad: hence except, or excepting, besides; that is, separated, not included. The verb is not in the Saxon; but in Dutch we have the verb in its primary sense. Buiten, to rove or wander, to go freebooting; buit, booty; buiten, out, without, abroad, besides, except; buiten boord, overboard; buiten deur, out of doors; buiten huis, an out house, buiten man, an out-man, a stranger, G. beute, booty, Sw. byte, booty, byta, to exchange, Dan. byttе, booty, a parting, division, distribution; bytta, to part, divide, exchange, barter; Sp. botin; It. bottino, Fr. butin, booty. The primary sense of booty is to rove or wander, to part or separate from; applied to persons, it is to wander; applied to things, it may include stripping. But, then, is a contraction of butan, and primarily a participle.]

1. Except, besides; unless.

Who can make, but Jeff ared Lycon? Smith.

That is, removed, separated, excepted. Lycon be separated, or excepted, who can it be?

And, but infirmity,
Which waits upon worn times, hath something seized
His wished ability, he had himself
With lenders and waters measured Shak.

That is, except, unless, separate this fact, that infirmity had seized his ability, he had measured the lands and waters.

In this use, but, butan, is a participle, equivalent to excepting, and may be referred to the person speaking, or, more naturally, it is equivalent to excepted, and with the following words, or clause, forming the case absolute.

Who can make, Lycon being excepted?
And, but my noble Moor is true of mind, it were much to put his [illegible] Shak.
[illegible] M[illegible] [illegible], of infinite love, is [illegible] other ways Hooker
There is no question but the king of Spain will reform many of the abuses Addison
It is not supposable but I may also be compelled soon to pay Dryden

In the last three examples, that is omitted after but

It is not supposable, but that I may also be compelled soon to pay

In these and all similar phrases, but denotes separation, exception

2. Only; as, there is but one man present.

A formidable man is but one man. Dryden

This use of but is a modern innovation, but perhaps too firmly established to be corrected. In all such phrases, a negative, not, nothing, or other word, is omitted. He is not a formidable man, but to his enemies, that is, except. There is not but one man present, that is, there is not except or besides one present. So, also, "Our light affliction is but for a moment." 2 Cor. iv. Our affliction is not, except for a moment

If they kill me, we shall but die. 2 Kings vii

The common people in America retain the original and correct phrase, usually employing a negative. They do not say, I have but one. On the other hand, they say, I have not but one, that is, I have not except one, except one, and I have none. This word but, for butan, is not a conjunction, nor has it the least affinity to that part of speech.

BUT, conj. [Sax. bote, reparation, satisfaction, compensation, and adverbially, moreover, further, that is, something added to make good, to supply that which is wanted, from betan, to make better, or more, to amend, that is, to advance; D. boete; Sw. bote, Dan. bøde, W. but, advantage. So, in Ger. aber, but, is the Eng. over. In some of these languages, it denotes a fine or penance, that which makes satisfaction. In Danish, profit; bøde, to gain or profit, W. buzaam; Goth. botyan, id. G. busse, büssen. We use this word as a noun, in the phrase, He gives a guinea to boot, that is, to make good, to satisfy, or by way of addition, and as a verb, in the phrase, What boots it? what gain or profit is it? It is radically the same word as but in better, and the radical sense is, to advance.]

More; further, noting an addition to supply what is wanting to elucidate or modify the sense of the preceding part of a sentence, or of a discourse, or to continue the discourse, or to exhibit a contrast.

Now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.—1 Cor. xiii
When pride cometh, then cometh shame, but with the lowly is wisdom.—Prov. x
Our wants are many and grievous, but quite of another kind
The house of representatives were well agreed in passing the bill, but the senate dissented.

This word is, in fact, a noun, equivalent to addition or supply; but, in grammatical construction, no inconvenience results from considering it to be a connective.

BUT, n. [Fr. bout, end, extremity, and but, end, aim, design, Arm. but or buz. It is sometimes written butt, especially when applied to the end of a plank. It coincides, in sense and elements, with L. pato, Sp. bote, a thrust, botar, to cast, It. botta, botto, bottare, Fr. botte, bander, Eng. post, and many other words. See Butt.]

BY, prep. [Sax. be or big, Goth. bi, Sw. and Dan. be D. bij, G. bei, all contracted from big. This word, in composition, is often written be, as in because, besiege. In Sw. and Dan. it is used only in composition. The Sw. and Dan pau, and Russ. po, may be from a different root, although they are nearly allied in signification, and may be the same word differently written. This preposition occurs as a prefix in all the Shemitic languages, contracted, indeed, into 2. (See the Introduction.) The primary sense is, pressing, close, near, at, but in Goth. and Sax it signifies, also, about, according to, on, with, against, after, &c. In some of these senses, it coincides with the Russ. po. The original verb to which this word belongs, most probably signifies to pass, to go, or come, to drive, to press.]

1 Near; close, as, sit by me, that house stands by a river. So in It. presso, from L. pressus; Fr. près, auprès. Hence, by was formerly used for against, as in our translation of the Bible, "though I know nothing by myself, (οὐδὲν ἐμαυτῷ σύνοιδα,) 1 Cor. iv.4. This use of the word continued down to the time of Baxter.

2. Near, in motion; as, to move, go, or pass, by a church. But it seems in other phrases, or with a verb in the past time, to signify past, gone beyond; as, the procession is gone by, the hour is gone by; John went by We now use past as an equivalent word, the procession is gone past. Gone by, is in strictness tautology, as now used; but I apprehend by signifies primarily near

3. Through, or with, denoting the agent, means, instrument, or cause; as, a city is destroyed by fire; profit is made by commerce; to take by force. This use answers to that of the Latin per, through, denoting a passing, acting, agency, or instrumentality.

4. "Day by day;" "year by year," "article by article." In these phrases, by denotes passing from one to another, or each particular separately taken.

5 "By the space of seven years." In this phrase, by denotes through, passing, or continuing, during.

6. "By this time, the sun had risen." The word here seems to denote at, present, or come to.

13. "To be present by attorney" In this phrase, by denotes means or instrument; through or in the presence of a substitute.

14 In the phrase, "north by west," the sense seems to be, north passing to the west, inclining or going westward, or near west.

As an adverb, by denotes, also, nearness, or presence; as, there was no person by at the time. But some noun is understood. So, in the phrase "to pass or go by," there is a noun understood

By and by, is a phrase denoting nearness in time, in a short time after, presently, soon.

When preposition was the head of the word, by and by, he is ellipsis.—Mark xiv.

By the bye, signifies, as we proceed or pass, [Fr en passant,] noting something interposed in the progress of a discourse which is distinct from the main subject The old phrase, "on the by," on the passage, is now obsolete.

To stand by, is to stand near, or to support

By, in lullaby, and in the nursery, a word used in lulling infants to sleep, is evidently allied to words found in many languages, signifying to rest, or be quiet, or to appease, that is, to press, to stop, as the G. wiegen, L. paco. It is used in Russia, as with us —bayu bai. This, probably, is the same word as the foregoing.

By, or bye, in by-law, [Sax. bilage,] is probably the Sw. by, Dan. bye, a village, town, borough, or city, from Sw. byggia, Dan. bygger, G. bauen, D. bouw n, to build, Sax. bȳan, to inhabit, that is, a town law, a municipal law.

In the common phrase good-by, by signifies passing, going. The phrase signifies, a good going, a prosperous passage, and it is precisely equivalent to farewell, [Sax. faran, to go, go well,] may you have a good going, equivalent to good speed in the phrase "to bid one good speed." [Not God speed, as is generally read and understood.]

By is used in many compound words, in most of which we observe the sense of nearness, closeness, or a withdrawing or seclusion.

C.

C the third letter in the English alphabet, and the first, a second articulation or consonant, is a palatal, nearly corresponding in sound with the Greek κ, kappa, and with the Hebrew כ, caph. It bears a middle place, in pronunciation, between the aspirate ח, and the palatal ג. It is a Roman character, borrowed from the Gr. κ, or from the Oriental כ, which was used in languages written from right to left, and when inverted, and the corners rounded, becomes C. In the old Etruscan, it was written ↄ, with the corners rounded, but not inverted, in Arcadian, C, as now written. That its sound in Latin was the same, or nearly the same, as that of kappa, may be known from the fact that the Greeks, while the Latin was a living language, wrote kappa for the Roman C Perhaps the same character may be the basis of the Arabic ج

As an abbreviature, C stands for Caius, Carolus, Cæsar, condemno, &c., and CC. for consulibus. As a numeral, C. stands for 100; CC. for 200, &c

In music, C after the clef is the mark of common time, in which each measure is a semibreve, corresponding to $\frac{4}{4}$. C is also the name of a note in the scale; the key note major, and the third minor, of the natural scale. Encyc

In English, C has two sounds, or rather it represents two very different articulations of the organs, one close, like K, which occurs before a, o, and u, the other a sibilant, precisely like s, which occurs before e, i, and y. The former is distinguished in this vocabulary by Ċ, which may be called ke. In Ross, C is precisely the English s, as it was in the old Greek alphabet. C before k is mute; as in brick, sick.

The expressions sought in the latter case are called integrals, the terms integral and differential being correlative. [L. calx, Sax. cealc, a stone, calculus, and chalk, D. kalk, G. kalk, Sw. kalck, Dan. kalk, Fr. chaux. The same word signifies chalk, lime, mortar, and the heel, and from that is formed calculus, a little stone. The word then signifies, primarily, a lump, or clod, or hard mass, and is allied to callus. If calx is from χαλιξ, the usual orthography was not observed by the Latins See CALCULATE.]

CA LYP'TRA, n. [Gr. καλυπτρα, a cover.]

The calyx of mosses, according to Linnæus; but not properly a calyx. It is a kind of veil, or cowl, which covers or is placed over the top of the anther, like an extinguisher. Martyn. Milne.

The calyptra of mosses is an appendage of the capsule. It at first closely invests the capsule, and its summit is the stigma. As the capsule approaches maturity, the calyptra is detached below, and suspended to the stigma like a hood. Cyc. Smith.

The calyptra of mosses is that part of the membranous covering, inclosing the sporangium or theca, (capsule,) which, when the membrane bursts around as the theca approaches maturity, is carried up and sustained on the summit of the latter. Lindley.

The theca was considered as an anther by Linnæus; afterwards as a capsule, or proper seed-vessel, surmounted by a stigma. It is now regarded as a sporangium, or vessel inclosing the spores, which correspond to the seeds in the higher orders of plants.

1. The outer covering of a flower, being the termination of the cortical epidermis or outer bark of the plant, which, in most plants, incloses and supports the bottom of the corol. In Linnæus's system, it comprehends the perianth, the involucrum, the ament, the spath, the glume, the calyptra, and the volva. Milne. Martyn. Encyc.

The opinion of Linnæus that the calyx is the continuation of the epidermis is now considered erroneous. Ed. Encyc. Smith.

The calyx is the most exterior integument of a flower, consisting of several verticillate leaves, (sepals,) united by their margins or distinct, usually of a green color, and of a less delicate texture than the corol. Lindley

The calyx, as thus defined, corresponds to the perianth of Linnæus.

In Sax. gomala, or gamal, is a camel, and an old man; gamal-frear, one that has long hair; gamol-ferhth, a man of great mind. In W. the word is cammarc, a crooked horse.]

1. A large quadruped used in Asia and Africa for carrying burdens, and for riders. As a genus, the camel belongs to the order of Pecora. The characteristics are: it has no horns; it has six fore teeth in the under jaw; the canine teeth are wide set, three in the upper and two in the lower jaw; and there is a fissure in the upper lip. The dromedary, or Arabian camel, has one bunch on the back, four callous protuberances on the fore legs, and two on the hind legs. The Bactrian camel has two bunches on the back. The llama of South America is a smaller animal, with a smooth back, small head, fine black eyes, and very long neck. The paco, or sheep, of Chili, has no bunch. Camels constitute the riches of an Arabian, without which he could neither subsist, carry on trade, nor travel over sandy deserts. Their milk is his common food. By the camel's power of sustaining abstinence from drink for many days, and of subsisting on a few coarse shrubs, he is peculiarly fitted for the parched and barren lands of Asia and Africa.

The head is like that of a stag, the neck is slender and elegant, furnished with a short mane. The color of the whole animal is a dirty white, marked with large, broad, rusty spots. CAM'PHOR-TREE, n. The tree from which camphor is obtained. According to Miller, there are two sorts of trees that produce camphor, one, a native of Borneo, which produces the best kind, the other, a native of Japan, which resembles the bay-tree, bearing black or purple berries. But the tree grows also in Sumatra. The stem is thick, the bark of a brownish color, and the ramification strong, close, and extended. The wood is soft, easily worked, and useful for domestic purposes. To obtain camphor, the tree is cut down, and divided into pieces, and the camphor taken out; it being found in small, whitish flakes, situated perpendicularly, in irregular veins, in and near the center of the tree. It is then repeatedly soaked and washed in soapy water, to separate from it all extraneous matter. It is then passed through three sieves of different texture, to divide it into three sorts, head, belly, and foot camphor. Camphor-oil is camphor, before the operations of nature have reduced it to a concrete form, and concrete camphor may be reduced to oil by nitric acid. Asiat. Re iv 1.

Camphor forms, with nitric acid, a liquid compound, (nitrate of camphor.) Graham.

Camphor is obtained from the Camphora officinarum, (Laurus Camphora, Linn.,) a native of China and Japan, and from the Dryobalanops aromatica, a native of Borneo and Sumatra. The camphor from the latter is harder, more brittle, and more highly valued, particularly in the East.

This term is also applied to the larvæ of other insects, such as the Tenthredo, or saw-fly, but is more generally confined to the lepidopters. CAT'SUP, n. See CATCHUP, KETCHUP.

CAT'TLE, n. sing. or pl. [Norm. catal, chastel, and chatteux, goods, commodities, movables; Arm. chetal, beasts; Port. gado. In Syr. and Ch. נכס and נכסת signify a flock, herd, possession, goods. But Spelman alleges that the word chattel is contracted from capitalia, capital, from caput, a word used in the middle ages for all goods, movable and immovable, answering nearly to the use of Gr. κεφαλαιον, Acts xxii. 28, πολλου κεφαλαιου, "with a great price or sum I obtained this freedom." Qu. Sp. caudal, wealth, property, capital sum. Cattle may be from the root of It. cattare, to get, and denote possessions.]

1. Beasts or quadrupeds in general, serving for tillage or other labor, and for food to man. In its primary sense, the word includes camels, horses, asses, all the varieties of domesticated horned beasts or the bovine genus, sheep of all kinds, and goats, and perhaps swine. In this general sense it is constantly used in the Scriptures. See Job i. 3. Hence, it would appear that the word properly signifies possessions, goods; but whether from a word originally signifying a beast, — for in early ages beasts constituted the chief part of a man's property, — or from a root signifying to get or possess, Gr. κτασθαι, It. cattare, or from capitalia, it is not easy to determine. This word is restricted to domestic beasts, but, in England, it includes horses, which it ordinarily does not in the United States, at least not in New England.

2. In the United States, cattle, in common usage, signifies only beasts of the bovine genus, oxen, bulls, cows and their young. In the laws respecting domestic beasts, horses, sheep, asses, mules and swine are distinguished from cattle, or neat cattle. Thus the law in Connecticut, requiring "that all the owners of any cattle, sheep, or swine, shall earmark or brand all their cattle, sheep, and swine," does not extend to horses. Yet it is probable that a law, giving damages for a trespass committed by cattle breaking into an inclosure, would be adjudged to include horses.

In Great Britain, beasts are distinguished into black cattle, including bulls, oxen, cows and their young, and small cattle, including sheep of all kinds and goats.

CAUSE, (kauz,) n. [Fr. cause, Sp. Port. and It. causa; L. causa, from the Celtic; Welsh achaws, effecting power, allied to cais, effort, caisiaw, to seek or go after, to attempt; Arm. caus or cos. The primary sense is to urge, press, impel, like sequor, whence suit; hence, to accuse, to attack or follow with a charge. The root of this word coincides with that of castle, cast, &c., which express a driving. A cause is that which moves, excites, or impels, to action or effect; in law, a pressing for a claim (See QUESTION.) Cause, sake, and thing, have the like radical sense.]

1. A suit or action in court; any legal process which a party institutes to obtain his demand, or by which he seeks his right, or his supposed right. This is a legal, scriptural, and popular use of the word, coinciding nearly with case, from cado, and action, from ago, to urge or drive.

5 That which a party or nation pursues; or rather pursuit, prosecution of an object. We say, Bible societies are engaged in a noble cause. [See the first definition.] Hence the word cause is used to denote that which a person or thing favors, that to which the effort of an intelligent being are directed, as, to promote religion is to advance the cause of God. So we say, the cause of truth or of justice. In all its applications, cause retains something of its original meaning — struggle, impelling force, contest, effort to obtain or to effect something.

The Spanish has calzada, a causey, or way paved and raised; Port. calçada, a pavement, and stone used in paving. Both these words are evidently from the same root as Sp. calzas, Port. calçado, Sp. calçes, hose, loose breeches, trowsers, shoes, Fr. chausse and the French word is evidently the same, with the loss of l. The sense is probably taken from putting on, covering, Port. calçar, to put on shoes or stockings, to pave; Sp. calzar, id.; L. calceo, inculco.]

The orthography of this word, from its derivation and the analogy of other European languages, would properly be chemistry. It is the Arabic كيميا kimsa, the occult art or science, from كمي kamai, to conceal. This was originally the art or science now called alchemy; the art of converting baser metals into gold. The order of Diocletian, directing search to be made for books treating of the wonderful art of making gold and silver, and all that should be found to be committed to the flames, proves the origin of this art to be as remote as the close of the third century; and it was probably somewhat earlier. Gibbon, ch. 13. It is not improbable that this art was used in counterfeiting coins. The common orthography is from χεω, to melt or fuse; the old orthography was from χυω, the same word, differently written; both having no foundation but a random guess. If lexicographers and writers had been contented to take the orthography of the nations in the south of Europe, where the origin of the word was doubtless understood, and through whom the word was introduced into England, the orthography would have been settled, uniform, and corresponding exactly with the pronunciation.]

This change of wheat and barley into oats he ascribes to a moist soil, wet weather, bad seed, &c. This opinion coincides with observations in America, as wheat is most liable to perish in moist land, and often in such places, almost all the wheat is killed, and instead of it chess often appears. W. clut, a patch, a clout; clytiaw, to patch; Sax geclutod, sewed together, clouted, patched, gesceod mid gecludedum scon, shod with clouted shoes. This undoubtedly signifies patched shoes, for clut, in Saxon, does not signify a nail. The word clout, a nail, may be from the French clou, clouter, from L. clavus, from the root of L. claudo, cludo. Whether clouted brogues, in Shakspeare, signify patched shoes or shoes studded with nails, let the critic determine. Such shoes are common in England, and were formerly worn in America. In this case, the verb clout must signify, to nail, or fasten with nails, to stud.

Quincy.*

2. In grammar, a point or character formed thus [:], used to mark a pause greater than that of a semicolon, but less than that of a period; or rather, it is used when the sense of the division of a period is complete, so as to admit a full point; but something is added by way of illustration, or the description is continued by an additional remark, without a necessary dependence on the foregoing members of the sentence. Thus,

A brute arrives at a point of perfection he can never pass: in a few years he has all the endowments he is capable of. Spect. No. 111

The colon is often used before an address, quotation, or example. "Mr. Grey was followed by Mr. Erskine, who spoke thus: 'I rise to second the motion of my honorable friend.'" But the propriety of this depends on the pause, and this depends on the form of introducing the quotation, for after say, said, or a like word, the colon is not used, and seems to be improper. Thus, in our version of the Scriptures, such members are almost invariably followed by a comma: "But Jesus said to them, 'Ye know not what ye ask.'"

The use of the colon is not uniform; nor is it easily defined and reduced to rules. Indeed, the use of it might be dispensed with without much inconvenience.

COME, (kum,) v. i.; pret. CAME, part COME. [Sax. cuman, or cwiman; Goth. qwiman, pret qwom, D. koomen, pret. kwam, G. kommen, Sw. komma, Dan. kommer, to come. Qu. W. cam, Ir. crim, a step.

And qu the Ar. قام kauma; Heb. Ch. קום to rise, or stand erect; to set or establish, to subsist, consist, remain; to rectify, or set in order, and in Arabic, to be thick, stiff, or congealed. The senses of the words appear to be very different, but we use come in the sense of rising or springing, applied to corn; the corn comes or comes up, G. kommen. So the butter comes, when it separates from the whey and becomes thick or stiff And is not our common use of come, when we invite another to begin some act, or to move, equivalent to rise, being originally directed to persons sitting or reclining, in the Oriental manner? Coming implies moving, driving, shooting along, and so we use set; we say, to set forward, the tide sets northerly.]

1. To move toward; to advance nearer, in any manner, and from any distance. We say, the men come this way, whether riding or on foot; the wind comes from the west, the ship comes with a fine breeze, light comes from the sun. It is applicable, perhaps, to every thing susceptible of motion, and is opposed to go.

2. To draw nigh; to approach, to arrive, to be present; as, the time has come.

Come thou and all thy house into the ark. — Gen. vii
All my time will I wait, till my change come. — Job xiv
When shall I come [illegible] — Ps. xlii
Then shall the [illegible] — Matt. xxiv
Thy kingdom come, thy will be done. — Matt. vi

3. To advance and arrive at some state or condition; as, the ships came to action, the players came to blows, is it come to this?

His sons come to honor, and he knoweth it not. — Job xiv

I wonder how he came to know what had been done, how did he come by his knowledge? the heir comes into possession of his estate; the man will come, in time, to abhor the vices of his youth, or he will come to be poor and despicable, or to poverty.

In these and similar phrases, we observe the process or advance is applied to the body or to the mind, indifferently, and to persons or events.

4. To happen or fall out, as, how comes that? let come what will. Hence, when followed by an object or person, with to or on, to befall, to light on.

It is the G. kramen, Icelandic kema, to bud or germinate.

7. To become.

So came I a widow Shak

8. To appear or be formed, as butter, to advance or change from cream to butter; a common use of the word; as, the butter comes. Hudibras.

This is the heir; come, let us kill him. — Matt. xxi.

When repeated, it sometimes expresses haste, come, come. Sometimes it expresses or introduces rebuke.

As the sense of come is to move, in almost any manner, in its various applications, that sense is modified indefinitely by other words used in connection with it. Thus, with words expressing approach, it denotes advancing nearer; with words expressing departure, as from, of, out of, &c., it denotes motion from, &c.

To come about; to happen, to fall out; to come to pass; to arrive. How did these things come about? So the French venir à bout, to come to the end, that is, to arrive.

To come about; to turn, to change, to come round. The wind will come about from west to east. The ship comes about. It is applied to a change of sentiments.

I am come, thou art come, he is come, we are come, &c. This use of the substantive verb, for have, is perhaps too well established to be rejected; but have or has should be used in such phrases. The word denotes a band or number of men under one flag or standard. What decides this question is, the Spanish mode of writing the word with a tilde, titled n, compañia, for this is the manner of writing pano, cloth, whereas panis, bread, is written pan. The orthography of the word in the other languages is confirmatory of this opinion.]

COM-PARE', v. t. [L. comparo, to prepare, to provide or procure, to make equal, to examine; com and paro, to prepare, It. parare, to dress, to adorn; also, to parry, Sp. parar, to prepare, to halt, to stop, to prevent, to detain, to stake at cards, Port. parar, to stop or cease to go forward, to make or confine upon; to touch or be bounded, to tend to, to drive at some end, to aim at, to come or, to hinder to parer, or ward off, to turn or change in inclination or regards, to lay or stake (as a wager), Sp. parada, a halt, stop, pause, a fold for cattle, a relay of horses or mules, a dam or bank, a bet, stake, or wager, a parade, or place of exercise for troops; Port. id. Arm. paret, W. parodi, to prepare. This seems to be the Sp. and Port. barar, of the same signification. The primary sense is, to thrust, drive, or strike; hence, to drive or force off, to evade, to pare, hence, to prepare or dress, which may be from separating, as in the French parer des cuirs, to dress or curry leather, or from driving off, as we express the idea, that is, by arrangement, or display, or from setting in order, as we say, to fix. The sense of compare is allied to the Portuguese application of the word, to come to, to meet; and the L. pro equal, belongs to the same root, and seems to be combined in comparo. One of the principal significations is, to stop, that is, to set to fix. In fencing, a thrust is intercepted by thrusting the weapon aside. In gaming, it is to lay or throw down. All the senses unite in that of extending, thrusting, or driving. W. par, that is, contiguous, pareddiaw, a pair, a fellow, Eng. peer, L. par. The latter word seems to signify, extended, or reaching to, and to be closely allied to the Portuguese sense of contiguity.]

1. To set or bring things together in fact or in contemplation, and to examine the relations they bear to each other, with a view to ascertain their agreement or disagreement in any thing; as, to compare two pieces of cloth, two tables, or coins; to compare reasons and arguments; to converse pleasure with pain.

In comparing movable things, it is customary to bring them together, for examination. In comparing things immovable or remote, and abstract ideas, we bring them together in the mind, as far as we are able, and consider them in connection. Comparison therefore is really collation, or it includes it.

2. To liken; to represent as similar, for the purpose of illustration.

Solon compared the people to the sea, and orators and counsellors to the winds; for that the sea would be calm and quiet, if the winds did not trouble it. Bacon.

In this sense compare is followed by with.

4. In grammar, the formation of an adjective in its several degrees of signification; as, strong, stronger, strongest, greenish, green, greener, greenest, glorious, more glorious, most glorious. In English, there are strictly four degrees of comparison.

The distinction between similitude and comparison is, that the former has for its object the quality, the latter, to the quantity. In regard to the latter, a more and less, similitude is between good and bad. Hannibal — being like a tempest on the declivities of the Alps — is a likeness by similitude. The sublimity of the scripture and prophetic style is that of Homer, in such as Chimbet is louder than a whisper — a likeness by comparison. J. Q. Adams, let. ix.

But comparison has reference to quality as well as quantity.

1. Stretch, reach; extent; the limit or boundary of a space, and the space included, applied to time, space, sound, &c. Our knowledge lies within a very narrow compass. 5. An instrument, often called the mariner's compass, used for directing or ascertaining the course of ships at sea. It consists of a circular box, containing a paper card marked with the thirty-two points of direction, and fixed on a magnetic needle, that always points to the north, the variation excepted. The needle, with the card attached to it, turns on a pin in the center of the box. The box is covered with glass, to prevent the motion of the card from being disturbed by the wind, and is so suspended as to remain always in an horizontal position, notwithstanding the motion of the ship. Encyc.

6. An instrument used in surveying land, constructed, in the main, like the mariner's compass, but with this difference, that the needle is not fixed into the card, moving with it, but plays alone; the card being drawn on the bottom of the box, and a circle divided into 360 degrees on the limb. This instrument is used in surveying land, and in directing travelers in a desert or forest, miners, &c. Encyc.

CON, [with or against.] A Latin inseparable preposition or prefix to other words. Ainsworth remarks that con and cum have the same signification, but that cum is used separately, and con in composition. Con and cum may be radically distinct words. The Irish comh, or coimh, is equivalent to the Latin con; and the Welch cyn, convertible into cyn, appears to be the same word, denoting, says Owen, a mutual act, quality, or effect. It is precisely equivalent to the Latin con, in compare, compono; and the Latin com, in composition, may be the Celtic comh or cym. But, generally, it seems to be con, changed into com. Ainsworth deduces cum from the Greek συν; for originally it was written cyn But this is probably a mistake.

Con coincides, in radical letters and in signification, with the Teutone gain, gen, gean, igen, igien, in the English again, against, Sax. gean, ongean; Sw. igen, Dan. igien. Whatever may be its origin or affinities, the primary sense of the word is probably from some root that signifies to meet or oppose, or turn and meet; to approach to, or to be with. This is the radical sense of most prepositions of the like import. [See the English With, Again.] So in Irish, comne, a meeting, os comne, opposite.

Con, in compounds, is changed into l before l, as in colligo, to collect, and into m before a labial, as in compare, to compare. Before a vowel or h, the n is dropped; as in coalesco, to coalesce, to co operate, co habito, to restrain. It denotes union, as in conjoin: or opposition, as in conflict, contend. Qu. W gan, with CON, [abbreviated from Latin contra, against.] In the phrase pro and con, for and against, con denotes the negative side of a question. As a noun, a person who is in the negative, as, the pros and cons.

D. kennen, to know, understand, or be acquainted. kunnen, to be able, can, to know or understand, to hold or contain; the last signification coinciding with the W. gann, to contain. G. kennen, to know, and konnen, to be able. Dan. kan, to be able, pret. kunde, whence kundskab, knowledge, skill, experience. Sw. kanna, to know; kunna, to be able, to be skilled, to know The primary sense is, to strain or stretch, which gives the sense of strength, power, as in can, and of holding, containing, comprehending, as, contain, from continuo, teneo, Gr. τεινω, L. tendo. And this signification connects these words with gin, in its compounds, begin, Sax. beginnan, anginnan, &c., to strain, to try, to stretch forward and make an effort, also with the Gr. γενναω, L. gigno, to beget, or to bring forth See Class Gn, No. 29, 30, 40, 42, 45, 58. 1. Agreement of the mind to what is proposed or stated by another, accord; hence, a yielding of the mind or will to that which is proposed; as, a parent gives his consent to the marriage of his daughter.

We generally use this word in cases where power, rights, and claims, are concerned. We give consent, when we yield that which we have a right to withhold, but we do not give consent to a mere opinion or abstract proposition. In this case, we give our assent. But assent is also used in conceding what we may withhold. We give our assent to the marriage of a daughter. Consequently, assent has a more extensive application than consent. Thus the stone in the bladder, by vellicating the fibres, will produce spasms and colic in the bowels, a shameful thing seen or heard will produce blushing in the cheeks. Quincy. Encyc.

But many facts indicate that other causes than nervous communication produce sympathy.

He was obliged, paramount to all other considerations, to march an asylum Dryden

6. Reason; that which induces to a determination; as, he was moved by the considerations set before him.

7. In law, the reason which moves a contracting party to enter into an agreement; the material cause of a contract; the price or motive of a stipulation. In all contracts, each party gives something in exchange for what he receives.

A contract is an agreement, upon sufficient consideration. This consideration is express or implied; express, when the thing to be given or done is specified; implied, when no specific consideration is agreed upon, but justice requires it and the law implies it; as, when a man labors for another, without stipulating for wages, the law infers that he shall receive a reasonable consideration. A good consideration is that of blood, or natural love; a valuable consideration is such as money, marriage, &c. Hence, a consideration is an equivalent or recompense, that which is given as of equal estimated value with that which is received.

CON-SID'ER ING, ppr Fixing the mind on, meditating on, pondering, viewing with care and attention; deliberating on.

Note. — We have a peculiar use of this word, which may be a corruption for considered, or which may be a deviation from analogy by an insensible change in the structure of the phrase. "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, considering the weakness of our nature." As a participle, this word must here refer to us, or the sentence can not be resolved by any rule of English syntax It would be correct to say, "It is not possible for us to act otherwise, the weakness of our nature being considered," or, "We, considering the weakness of our nature, can not act otherwise." But the latter phrase is better grammar than it is sense We use other participles in like manner; as, "Allowing for tare, the weight could not be more than a hundred pounds." These and similar phrases are anomalous. But considering is no more a kind of conjunction, in such a phrase, than it is a noun.

CON-SID'ER-ING-LY, adv. With consideration or deliberation. Whole Duty of Man

CON'SO NANCE, n. [Fr., from L. consonantia, consonans, from consono, to sound together, con and sono, to sound. See Sound and Tone.]

1. Accord or agreement of sounds. In music, consonance is an accord of sounds, simultaneously produced, which creates an agreeable sensation in the ear, as the third, fifth, and eighth. It denotes, also, the according intervals. When the interval of a consonance is invariable, it is called perfect, but when it may be either major or minor, it is termed imperfect. Busby.

CON'SO-NANT, n. A letter, or element of speech, having either no vocality, as p and the other mutes, or only an imperfect vocality, as b, l, &c. For this reason, consonants are ordinarily sounded only in connection with a vowel, and hence the name. The consonants are better called articulations, as they are the names given to the several closings or junctions of the organs of speech, which precede and follow the openings of the organs with which the vowels are uttered. These closings are perfect, and wholly intercept the voice, as in the syllables ck, ep, et, or imperfect, and admitting some slight sound, as in en, er. Hence, some articulations are called mutes, and others semi vowels The consonants begin or end syllables, and their use is to determine the manner of beginning or ending the vocal sounds. These closings or configurations of the organs, being various, serve to diversify the syllables, as in uttering ba, da, pa, or ab, ad, ap; and, although b and p may be considered as representing no sounds at all, yet they so modify the utterance of ab, ap, or ba, pa, that the slight difference between these articulations may be perceived as far as the human voice can be distinctly heard.

1. A high officer in the monarchical establishments of the middle ages. Brande.

The lord high constable of England was the seventh officer of the crown. He had the care of the common peace, in deeds of arms and matters of war, being a judge of the court of chivalry, now called the court of honor. To this officer, and to the earl marshal, belonged the cognizance of contracts, deeds of arms without the realm, and combats and blazonry within the realm. The power of this officer was so great, and so improperly used, that it was abridged by the 13th Richard II., and was afterward forfeited in the person of Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, in 1521. It has never been granted to any person since that time, except pro hac vice, or on a particular occasion. Encyc.

2. An officer of the peace. In England, there are high constables, petty constables, and constables of London. The high constables are chosen at the court leets of the franchise or hundred over which they preside, or, in default of that, by the justices of the quarter sessions, and are removable by the same authority that appoints them. The petty constables are chosen by the jury of the court leet, or, if no court is held, they are appointed by two justices of the peace. In London, a constable is nominated in each precinct by the inhabitants, and confirmed at the court of wardmote. The duty of constables is to keep the peace, and for this purpose they are invested with the power of arresting and imprisoning, and of breaking open houses.

In the United States, constables are town or city officers of the peace, with powers similar to those possessed by the constables in Great Britain. W. crete and cret, constitution, temper, also, a trembling or shivering with cold. Ir. croth or cruth, form, shape, cruthaighim, to create, to prove, assert, maintain. From the Celtic, then, it appears that the L. creo is contracted by the loss of a d or th. The Welsh has also cri, a cry, and criaw, to cry, both deduced by Owen from cre; but cre is a contraction of creun, to cry, or of gryd, a crying or whooping, or cryd, a shaking. In Welsh, also, cri signifies rough, raw, crude, all which unite in the root of cry, cradle, L. rudo, to bray. The primary sense of create and of cry is the same, to throw or drive out, to produce, to bring forth, precisely as in the Shemitic רנן. CRED'I-BIL/I-TY, n. [Fr. credibilité, from L. credibilis.]

Credibleness; the quality or state of a thing which renders it possible to be believed, or which admits belief, on rational principles; the quality or state of a thing which involves no contradiction or absurdity. Credibility is less than certainty, and greater than probability; indeed, it is less than probability, but [illegible]ly allied to it. [See CREDIBLE.]

CRED[illegible]E, a. [L. credibilis.]

1. That may be believed, worthy of credit. A thing is credible, when it is known to be possible, or when it involves no contradiction or absurdity, it is more credible, when it is known to come within the ordinary laws or operations of nature. With regard to the divine Being and his operations, every thing is credible which is consistent with his perfections, and supported by evidence or unimpeachable testimony, for his power is unlimited. With regard to human affairs, we do not apply the word to things barely possible, but to things which come within the usual course of human conduct, and the general rules of evidence.

2. Worthy of belief, having a claim to credit, applied to persons. A credible person is one of known veracity and integrity, or whose veracity may be fairly deduced from circumstances. We believe the history of Aristides and Themistocles, on the authority of credible historians.

CRED'I-BLE-NESS, n. Credibility, worthiness of belief; just claim to credit. [See CREDIBILITY.]

CRED'I-BLY, adv. In a manner that deserves belief; with good authority to support belief.

CRED'IT, n. [Fr. crédit, It. credito, Sp. id., L. creditum. See CREED.]

1. Belief; faith, a reliance or resting of the mind on the truth of something said or done. We give credit to a man's declaration, when the mind rests on the truth of it, without doubt or suspicion, which is attended with wavering. We give credit to testimony or to a report, when we rely on its truth and certainty.

2. Reputation derived from the confidence of others, esteem, estimation, good opinion founded on a belief of a man's veracity, integrity, abilities, and virtue, as, a physician in high credit with his brethren. Hence,

3. Honor; reputation, estimation, applied to men or things. A man gains no credit by profaneness, and a poem may lose no credit by criticism. The credit of a man depends on his virtues, the credit of his writings, on their worth.

4. That which procures or is entitled to belief, testimony; authority derived from one's character, or from the confidence of others. We believe a story on the credit of the narrator. We believe in miracles on the credit of inspired men. We trust to the credit of an assertion made by a man of known veracity.

5. Influence derived from the reputation of veracity or integrity, or from the good opinion or confidence of others, interest, power derived from weight of character, from friendship, fidelity, or other cause. A minister may have great credit with a prince. He may employ his credit to good or evil purposes. A man uses his credit with a friend, a servant, with his master.

6. In commerce, trust, transfer of goods in confidence of future payment. When the merchant gives a credit, he sells his ware on an expressed or implied promise that the purchaser will pay for them at a future time. The seller believes in the solvability and probity of the purchaser, and delivers his goods on that belief or trust; or he delivers them on the credit or reputation of the purchaser. The purchaser takes what is sold, on credit. In like manner, money is loaned on the credit of the borrower.

7. The capacity of being trusted, or the reputation of solvency and probity which entitles a man to be trusted. A customer has good credit or no credit with a merchant.

8. In book-keeping, the side of an account in which payment is entered; opposed to debit. The article is carried to one's credit, and that to his debit. We speak of the credit side of an account.

9. Public credit; the confidence which men entertain in the ability and disposition of a nation, to make good its engagements with its creditors; or the estimation in which individuals hold the public promises of payment, whether such promises are expressed or implied. The term is also applied to the general credit of individuals in a nation; when merchants and others are wealthy, and punctual in fulfilling engagements; or when they transact business with honor and fidelity; or when transfers of property are made with ease for ready payment. So we speak of the credit of a bank, when general confidence is placed in its ability to redeem its notes; and the credit of a mercantile house rests on its supposed ability and probity, which induce men to trust to its engagements. When the public credit is questionable, it raises the premium on loans.

> Cherish public credit. Washington.

10. The notes or bills which are issued by the public, or by corporations or individuals, which circulate on the confidence of men in the ability and disposition in those who issue them, to redeem them. They are sometimes called bills of credit.

The Gr. κριμα is undoubtedly a contraction, for in Norman the word is crisme. The root, the r, of these derivatives is the same as of the Ir creathar, a sieve, W. rhidyll, Eng. riddle; W. rhedaw, to secrete, to separate. We have screen, a riddle, from the root of κρινω, and riddle, from the Celtic root of κριτης, κριτικος. CRY, v. t., pret. and pp. CRIED. It ought to be CRIED. [Fr. crier. The Welsh has cri, a cry, and rough, raw, crau, to cry, clamor, or weep; and creu, to cry, to crave; both deduced by Owen from cro, a combining cause, a principle, beginning, or first motion; also, what pervades or penetrates, a cry. This is the root of create, or from the same root. Cre, Owen deduces from rhe, with the prefix cy; and rhe, he renders a run or swift motion. This is certainly contracted from rhed, a race, the root of rule; Owen to the contrary notwithstanding. All the senses of these words unite in that of shooting forth, driving forward, or producing. There is a class of words a little different from the foregoing, which exactly give the sense of cry. It. gridare, Sp. and Port. gritar, Sax. grædan; Sw. grata, Dan. græder; D krijten, W. grydaw, to utter a rough sound, from rhyd, the Welsh root of crydu, to shake or tremble, whence cradle. (W. creth, a trembling or shivering with cold, from cri; also, constitution, disposition.) The latter root, rhyd, crydu, would give cri, rough, raw, crude. Cry is a contracted word; but whether from the former or latter class of roots may be less obvious possibly, all are from one source. If not, I think cry is from the French crier, and this from gridare, gritar.]

CUT, v. t., pret. and pp. CUT. [Norm. cotu, cut. This word coincides in elements with the W cat, a piece, cateu, to cut, cwta, short, cwtau, to shorten, and with ysgythru, to cut off, to lop, to shred, to carve, which Owen deduces from ysgwth, a push, from gwth, a push or thrust, gwthiaw, to push, thrust, press. Whether cut is derived to us from the Welsh or not, may be a question; but I have not found the word in any of the Gothic or Teutonic languages. It is obviously from a common root with the L. cædo and cudo, and the primary sense is, to thrust, to drive, to strike; and to cut off is primarily to strike off. We have proof of this in our own language; for a stroke with a whip is called a cut, and our common people, when they urge a person to ride or run with haste, cry out, Cut on, cut on. The fact is the same with many other words which now signify to separate with an edged tool. See Class Gd, No. 2, 4, 8, 43, 49, 56, 59, and, in a different dialect, Class Gs, No. 3, 6, 28, 32, 40, 41, 42, 67.]

But when an entire separation of the body is intended, it is usually followed by off, down, asunder, in two, in pieces, or other word denoting such severance. D.

D, in the English alphabet, is the fourth letter and the third articulation. It holds the same place in the English as in the Chaldee, Syriac, Hebrew, Samaritan, Greek, and Latin alphabets. In the Arabic, it is the eighth; in the Russian, the fifth; and in the Ethiopic, the nineteenth letter.

D is a dental articulation, formed by placing the end of the tongue against the gum just above the upper teeth. It is nearly allied to T, but is not so close a letter, or rather it does not interrupt the voice so suddenly as T, and in forming the articulation, there is a lingual and nasal sound, which has induced some writers to rank D among the lingual letters. It has but one sound, as in do, din, bad, and is never quiescent in English words, except in a rapid utterance of such words as handkerchief.

As a numeral, D represents five hundred, and when a dash or stroke is placed over it, thus, D̄, it denotes five thousand.

As an abbreviation, D. stands for Doctor, as, M. D. Doctor of Medicine, D. T. Doctor of Theology, or S. T. D. Doctor of Sacred Theology, D. D. Doctor of Divinity, or donо dedit, D. D. D. dat, dicat, dedicat, and D. D. D. D. dignum Deo donum dedit.

The Arm. ma-mesell, va-mesell, or man-mesell, a woman or maid am, seems to indicate that the first syllable is a prefix, and mesell, Eng. miss, a distinct word. But damoiselle, Norm. demeelle, from which we have damsel, is doubtless from the Italian damigella, a diminutive, formed from dama, like the L. domicilium, from domus, and pesicillus, from the root of penna. The Italian damigello, in the masculine gender, shows the propriety of the ancient application of damsel to males.]
